With security concerns on the rise, the founders of Tychi Systems recognized a need for a technologically advanced lock with a sleek look complementary to residential applications. The concept of biometrics peaked these engineers' interest, and after two years in development, a cutting-edge product emerged that satisfied the functional and design demands of a residential door lock system.

BioKnob recognizes programmed fingerprints by sensing minutia points on users' fingers. The knob can be programmed with 100 authorized users. Five threshold settings determine how many points the knob reads—fewer points sensed means easier access—so the knob can be set for security or convenience. An audit feature also records up to 1,000 entries by user, date, and time. After a user accesses the door, the lock automatically resets. If an unidentified user fiddles with the knob, an alarm will sound. The battery-operated BioKnob lasts for 1,500 operations, indicating a low battery when approximately 50 operations are left, and can be recharged in about 3 hours. Available in gold or silver, BioKnob fits standard U.S. knob holes.
